Objectives of the course

The modular articulation of the didactic plan of the Doctorate program in "Science and Economics, Business and Law", of a marked interdisciplinary nature, guarantees the full integration of all graduates and all graduates in the field of economic-law: the preliminary treatment of issues related to the "research methodology" allows the academic researcher to be trained with technical-scientific tools essential for the carrying out of studies and research activities. The Doctorate, therefore, aims to train Doctoral students on the methodological, theoretical and analytical knowledge necessary to be able to elaborate and develop a rigorous research project on economic, business and legal issues as well as – possibly – transversal issues to the aforementioned areas. In this sense, the training objectives are aimed at advancing knowledge in the economy of local, national, European and international development, as well as relative production systems; in the economy and business management and innovation; in extended public law – national, European and international – and in private economic and labour law. The interdisciplinary nature of the PhD also aims to develop research paths oriented to the implementation of sustainability, from a dual economic and legal point of view: the current, profound, cultural interference between economic science and legal science requires – in fact – the formation of professional profiles and capable researchers to manage culturally, critically and scientifically elaborate the transversal issues related to both the aforementioned areas. The PhD Course aims, therefore, to train experts in Law & Economics, methodologically capable and scientifically equipped, both as required by the labor market and the academic world, both Italian and European.
